INTRO

Figuring out what identities work for you can be tricky. It’s totally okay to question your identity. It’s okay if you’ve had 30 other identities before the identity you hold now, and it’s okay if you’ll have 30 other identities later. You get to decide.

In both straight and queer communities, some people get a lot of flak for how they identify. For example, people who have non-binary identities, who are bisexual, who are trans*, or asexual might not have their identities respected.

This means that people may judge other people negatively on the basis of their presumed identity. This is called biphobia when it happens to people in bisexual communities and transphobia when it happens to people in trans communities. People may also judge others based on their belief that there are only two genders, and that these two genders are the complete opposite of one another. This is not true for all people. Some people may identify within this gender binary, and others might not identify as either men or women but would locate themselves somewhere else on a gender spectrum. Many people also have a sexual orientation that is beyond the standard definitions of straight or gay.

Sometimes people think that they can tell how somebody identifies by looking at them. This isn’t true. You get to decide how you identify, and other people get to decide how they identify. It is not okay to dismiss anyone’s identity.
